The metabolism of steroid hormones in the rat is mostly mediated by cytochrome P450 3A (CYP3A). In the present study we have examined the substrate specificity of the rat liver microsomal form of CYP3A for steroid hormones by means of the deconjugation of glucuronide and sulfate in 17 steroid hormones, 24 steroid intermediates and a variety of other mono and multisubstrate combinations. The deconjugation efficiencies for glucuronide of 16 steroids ranged from 1 to 90% in a wide range of pH and ionic strength. The deconjugation efficiencies for sulfate ranged from 14 to > 90% in a wide range of pH and ionic strength. The deconjugation of glucuronide was inhibited by carbon monoxide and the reductase inhibitor SKF-525 A, whereas the deconjugation of sulfate was inhibited by SKF-525 A. The deconjugation of glucuronide was stimulated by the CYP3A-selective substrate vinblastine, whereas the deconjugation of sulfate was stimulated by the CYP3A-selective substrate miconazole. The activation of steroid intermediates of steroid hormones by CYP3A was not in a manner consistent with an electrophilic mechanism, but the conversion of the corresponding hydroxylated derivatives to the corresponding glucuronide or sulfate derivatives seemed to be also catalyzed by this enzyme. The metabolism of a variety of mono and multi substrate combinations with steroid intermediates and eight other 50b96ab0b6
